Reader's Advisory

For those of you at academic institutions, you should be aware of a site functionality that will help you and your students access content more easily on JSTOR. You may have heard about JSTOR's Institution Finder, a login service that directs off-campus users to a proxy login page for authentication when they find JSTOR content on the web. A growing number of end-users are finding content from a variety of places including Google, Google Scholar and Wikipedia and coming directly to JSTOR, unauthenticated.

The Institution Finder is designed to return the end-user to the exact JSTOR page they started on, most often a specific article, rather than the home page or a search page. An on-campus user will get automatic access to the full-text, but users outside of the IP range will be denied access. When denied access to the full-text, the user is presented with some options for accessing JSTOR including a link to the JSTOR login page and the Institution Finder: (<http://www.jstor.org/action/showLogin>). From there they can search for their institution and follow a link to a proxy login page. After logging in they are authenticated by JSTOR and will be automatically redirected to the original full-text article.
