Reader’s Advisory
The September 2014 issue of College & Research Libraries includes a report by Nancy M. Foasberg, entitled: Student Reading Practices in Print and Electronic Media

http://crl.acrl.org/content/75/5/705.full.pdf+htm

“Despite the ever-increasing popularity of new ways of reading, the study participants read in a fairly traditional way. Most of them preferred to use print for long-form and academic reading, at least partly because they felt more comfortable annotating documents in a print environment. They read electronically a great deal, but this reading consisted primarily of brief, nonacademic materials.

Their dislike of electronic textbooks was especially striking... In the midst of this attention to the digital, it is worth noting that students in the present study were less comfortable using textbooks in an electronic format, and some of them said they usually print out the sections they use, thus negating any savings.”

Check out Berkeley’s Environmental Design Archives. The EDA is showcasing the many unique materials housed at the archive. Each day an image from one of the architecture, landscape architecture, design, or architectural photography collections is posted.
